727 KANSAS AVENUE

EVENING CHAT

BY RUTH CAMERON.

Not long ago a woman wrote me a little story of a mother who had her While she was looking at the new models, the boy went from hat to hat, examining them. Being of an investitating turn of mind, he was anxious to see what everything was made of, and on each hat would squeeze some ornment between his fingers, saying "That's glass" or "that's wax" or "that cloth," as the demolishment proved. One of the clerks, catching sight of the destruction that was going on. While she was looking at the new

One of the clerks, catching sight of the destruction that was going on, bore down upon the youngster with a sentle "Oh. little boy, please, you mustn't." Whereupon the mother, instead of reproving the boy and apologizing for his actions, turned upon the oursely and haughtily announcing "Ho may play with all the hats he likes, and spoil every one in the shop if he wishes. His grandfather owns the store."

My correspondent winds up her tale by inquiring if I approve of the mother, in any other fault.

Miss Marie Lagerstrom will return the bonfire's flame.

It seems to me an axiom of child training that children should treat servants with thorough respect and courtesy, and that failure to do so should be punished as unfailingly as any other fault.

I have several times heard of servants with their work, and the free dow with which children were allowed to interfere with their work, and the inquiring if I have any common to elders that didn't deserve to be indeed as caution. I can tell you my admiration shriveled are action of elders that didn't deserve to be indeed as caution. A Topeka girl who has been visiting in "little old New York," tells a story of the enchantment distance lends to a Kansas author. She says that the new novel, "The Price of the Prairies," is being eagerly read by everyone down east who can lay hands on it, and is talked about wherever the subject of the late books is mentioned. She told a number of her friends that she lived in the same block with the writer of the story and knew her well; that she had heard a good deal of the novel read from the manuscript as its chapters were added from day to day. Soon she began to notice that she was a object of curlosity and more than orthinary attention. Then people she didn't know came to call on her and to ask her to tell them about her neighbor with the pen of genius, and nothing about her was too trivial to be interesting. Thus the young lady had her day of fame even though she shone by reflected giory.
